Branch offices in Thailand are treated similarly to limited companies, only there are no shareholders or directors, as it is not a registered company, but a local branch of a foreign Head Office. This type of business form has its advantages: there are no special conditions for foreign companies to register a branch office and there is no requirement. The list below highlights the main traits of the branch, and characteristics that set it apart from the subsidiary or the limited liability company. Investors are advised to keep these in mind when choosing to open this business form, especially the one referring to liability.

1. Easy incorporation: the branch is easier to set up compared to a local company. The branch operations are approved in Thailand if the foreign company is able to show that the establishment of the branch will have a direct economic benefit in the country. The branch is treated as a permanent establishment in Thailand and there are several conditions that must be met in terms of share capital according to the period of time for which it is established. Opening a branch in Thailand is not the only option for a foreign company to get started on the Thai market. Two other notable possibilities include opening a representative office or a subsidiary. In case you are interested in setting up a representative office or a subsidiary in a different country, such as Brazil, we recommend our partners – Com.
